Subject: Re: Sainsbury's actively publicise that their underwriters

Hi Simon,

Thanks for the update.

I have checked the Sainsbury's panel list again, and it appears that all the companies mentioned in that piece actually support the Build Back Better scheme. This makes the "several of whom" caveat feel somewhat hollow.

I am not sure that under the Consumer Duty requirements they can reasonably discriminate against a policyholder in this way. It is certainly an interesting question. Adam Clutterbuck used the term "misleading" in our email exchange regarding the publicity versus the reality, and I am inclined to agree with him.

That said, I am conscious that we are at a key stage of our discussions with Lloyds regarding the main claim, and our common goal is an agreement.

My view is that we should mention this point to them now. If they continue to push back on it—as I expect they will—we can simply "reserve our position" on the BBB element for later and proceed with the main settlement.

Interestingly, I think this specific point is emblematic of exactly why the household insurance industry is currently in such difficulty with consumers.

Good luck with your discussion with Lloyds. I hope they go well. Silks are standing by to go in this week.

Best regards,

Nicholas
