Hi James,

Sorry James, I missed your email.

I am pleased to say that finally today we have managed to get the server accessible via the net and we resolved the SSL issue.

Apparently, the issue is that one of the ports was closed and after spending a lot of time talking to your support team today we identified the issue and fixed it.

I cannot tell you the degree to which I feel frustrated by this episode. We took the server as you know at the end of January and only today are we able to access publicly via the web in an unrestricted way. We have had one issue after another.

I am not blaming anyone but it is incredible that it took us this long and created significant challenges for the business.

Nicholas

I keep on thinking we are very nearly there and then another issue arises. I am not ascribing blame, I am just relaying the reality that no one outside is able to access the server. I think the latest issue is to do with SSL but our domain hosting company assures me that they have done everything correctly at their end and my people say it is a server team issue so we go round in circles.

Anyway, let's speak tomorrow. 9:00am works well for me.

Thanks James.

Have you managed to set the machine up yet?

I await your confirmation
